Editorially Speaking

Two recent events came to our attention which have considerable philosophical and social interest. Both events started with the death by violence of a little girl, and both ended in circuit court.

The first started some time ago in our own community with the death of a little girl. The boy who confessed to the murder was fifteen and had been under psychiatric care for some time. A diagnosis of simple schizophrenia had been made by several observers. The prosecution could find no psychiatrist or psychologist to testify that this boy was medically sane. But under the McNaughton rule the prosecution pointed out that the boy was aware of right and wrong, no matter how mixed-up he was. The jury followed its own line of reasoning and brought in a verdict of guilty of second degree murder with a recommended sentence of sixty years.

The second event also started with the death of a little girl. The "murder" weapon in her case was a motor car. The man who wielded the weapon had been drinking. The prosecuting attorney of St. Louis County in a letter published in the Globe stated that the State's case was weak and publically stated that he made a "deal." The defendant pleaded guilty, was sentenced to six months in the county jail and immediately was granted probation. His driver's license was suspended.

Two murders of little girls. Sixty years to a mixed-up, sick kid and no days to an adult considered to be responsible but who has had other serious traffic offenses. This is justice under the Laws of the State of Missouri. And we might add that this same strange variation in the approach to murder with two different weapons could happen in many other states.

It is probable that the jury was afraid that the boy might be released from a state hospital to kill again. Of course, he will be eligible for parole in not too many years. What will the parole board do?

But no parole board will pass on the right of the man to drive his lethal weapon again. In six months he will be in the drivers seat again and if he should happen to be a psychopath of the gasoline stimuli variety then he can resume his life as a public enemy. He may never have another serious accident but if he has no great sense of the responsibility, which every driver should have, then he will always be a potential menace.

No one involved in the case of the boy believed that he should go free. His father, his attorneys and his doctors all believed that he should be confined, perhaps for life, and at least until he is completely well, without any question. But he should be in a hospital and not a prison.

In the other case nobody seemed to get excited about it all except the editors of the Globe who published a blistering editorial which indicted not the judge, not the prosecuting attorney, not the law, or even the man, although a few swipes were taken at all of these, but the people of the State of Missouri who have grown so apathetic about "murder on the highways" that no one seems to get the least bit excited about it all. We all, no matter where we live or who we are, seem to accept this slaughter as a part of our way of life.

We have long debates about the nuclear bombs, the morality of their use, and a lot of folks express guilt feelings every time they discuss the bomb and its sister even thirteen years after it all happened.

Yet, in those years we have killed on our highways about three times as many men, women and children as died in far away Japan in August of 1945.

Guilt feelings about murder with gasoline? They seem to be fairly well hidden.

In The Mail

Dear Dr. Dennie:

Our Jackson County Bulletin of October 18, 1958, was received a couple of days ago and I noted with pleasure your article on my early experience with acute poliomyelitis in 1910 and 1911.

In 1909 and 1910 I spent eight months in Vienna doing work in neurology and psychiatry. There I met Karl Landsteiner who first produced acute poliomyelitis in rhesus monkeys. He showed me the first animal inoculated.

In September 1910, I located in Kansas City and was placed on the faculty of the Medical School of the University of Kansas. Dr. Crumbine was then director of the health department of the state of Kansas. The medical school could not afford to take care of expenses required, such as money to purchase monkeys. At that time rhesus monkeys cost about $25 for each animal. My first order was for five monkeys, costing more than $125 f.o.b. New York. On a few occasions I took a monkey ill with poliomyelitis virus to my home for closer observation. Drugs were used in monkeys infected with the virus.

I noted that one monkey would give warning to the other monkeys when I entered the room, and not other people coming into the room.

I wish to give credit to Dr. Crumbine for his great interest in the health of the people living in the state of Kansas.

With kindest regards to you all, I remain

Yours very sincerely,
A. L. Skoog

Little Known Medical History

Charles C. Dennie

Charles Conover made a diagnosis of Hodgkin's disease in 1912 from a combination of three principles used at the present time; a thorough physical examination, an x-ray of the chest, and the histological examination of a lymph node taken from the neck. The result of treatment was the same at the beginning of the century as it is at the present time. The lives of some were prolonged by the use of x-ray and different chemicals. The causative factor of the disease was unknown then, as it is today. The pathologic diagnosis in this case was made by John R. Van Atta, who was Pathologist at the Kansas City General Hospital in 1911 and 1912.

In those early days the idea of heat therapy was already in vogue. Baker in California had made a conglomerate mixture of different killed organisms called phylacogen.

Given intravenously, the substance produced chills and a rise in temperature. Dr. Conover was among the first to use typhoid bacterin intravenously for the treatment of certain chronic diseases, notably arthritis. His first dose was 75,000,000 killed organisms. He certainly produced chills and fever, the latter sometimes reaching 106°.

The bacterin was made by Dr. Van Atta from cultures that he had isolated. He used no such fancy methods as the inoculation of animals as a safety measure, he just grew the typhoid bacilli, suspended them in salt water, heated them at the proper temperature and time element and the bacterin was ready.

Dr. Conover had no deaths due to this type of method, but he scared hell out of me, because I had to administer it.

Kenneth C. Hollweg attended the Inter American Congress of Radiology meeting in Lima, Peru, November 2-8. Dr. and Mrs. Hollweg also toured South America during this trip.

Winter with CO

With the advent of cold weather we are reminded of the dangers of carbon monoxide poisoning. In 1956 there were 146 deaths throughout the nation, and 2 in Kansas City from motor car gases. Carbon monoxide causes illness and death by reducing the oxygen supply to the body; displacing the oxygen in the red blood cells because it can combine with these oxygen carriers much more readily than oxygen.

Sitting in a car in a closed garage while the motor warms or remaining in a closed car with the motor running to keep warm may produce enough poisonous gas to cause headache, dizziness and nausea, if nothing worse. When the car is winterized the exhaust system should be checked for blown-out gaskets, leaking exhaust pipe connections and holes in mufflers. Leaving children in an idling motor car while the parent goes into the store is a practice all too common and very hazardous.

In the home one should be sure that stoves and heaters are connected with flue pipes to chimneys or other outlets to the outside air. Flues and chimneys blocked by debris, bird nests or soot have resulted in illness from fumes. Even the burners on water heaters may get out of adjustment; there are many places in the home where fuel may not be completely burned and dangerous quantities of CO will accumulate.

This winter we will probably read news stories again of deaths in tourist homes and motels. No doubt the morbidity about which we hear nothing, greatly exceeds the mortality from these highway hazards.

Forty Years Ago

Leo H. Pollock

In the month after September 26, 1918, there were at the University of Missouri, 1,020 cases of pneumonitis. About 400 of these were among soldiers sent to the University for special vocational training, and formed a section of our S.A.T.C. Blood cultures taken from all grades of pneumonitis (from cases of so-called influenza to severe pneumonia) showed in 80 per cent, a growth of a diplostreptococcus. On entering, the patient was given Dover's powder, 2½ to 5 grains, and quinine, 2½ to 5 grains, repeated every four hours. Medication by mouth was often discontinued on account of nausea. On the appearance of signs of consolidation, that is, areas of bronchial breathing and dullness, camphor — 36 grains in sterile olive oil—was given intramuscularly every eight hours in men and every ten hours in women. In the severe types of pneumonia, this dose was given as often as every four hours for four doses and then every eight hours. Some patients received as much as 800 grains in seven days. Since October 10, 1918, in the more severe cases that did not respond to the camphor, a transfusion of citrated blood from convalescent patients has been done. The results of this procedure were somewhat doubtful. Normal horse serum seemed to give a beneficial result in about the same percentage of cases.

What Do You Remember About?

1. Anyone proposing to administer a local anesthetic should be thoroughly familiar with the pharmacological behavior of the drug employed and be prepared to deal quickly with untoward reactions which may develop.
   Campbell, D., and Adriani, J.: Journal of the American Medical Association, 168, Oct. 18, 1958.
2. It is a valuable anesthesia and surgical adjunct; however, its greatest danger is ventricular fibrillation.
   Pratt, G. H., and Collins, V. J.: The Surgical Clinics of North America, 36, April, 1956.
3. Tatalum mesh should replace fascial and skin transplants and other methods advocated for the repair of the large and difficult hernias where poor tissues indicate that repair by the ordinary methods is prone to fail.
   Guy, C. C., and Werelius, C. Y., and Bell, L. B., Jr.: The Surgical Clinics of North America, 35, Feb., 1955.

Every Physician Knows

. . . that many ocular affections are unaccompanied by pain or external redness. The complaint is usually failure of sharp vision or discomfort on using the eyes. Certainly the thoughtful family physician will insist that his patients come under the care of a person qualified to recognize organic disturbance — an M.D., Eye Physician.
